Distinct Genre Features -- I liked how you added the star rating at the top as well as the director, TV rating, and movie length. When I clicked on the link at the button where it said publication modeled, it didn't bring me to a film review, so I would look into that. Since I am not really sure what film review it is modeled after I can't really identify any fixed or flexible features.

Distinct Audience -- The target audience of this piece was young adults or older teens. It was definitely clearly said in the film review at the end. I think maybe you could write a little bit more to the target audience and try to make it more personal to them.

Clear, Specific Purpose --I think that you did a really good job with the hook of this film review and a really good job with the brief summary. I think that you should add a little bit more about the argument and what you liked and didn't like about the film. You should also talk about why the audience should watch this film.

Supportive Evidence/Development -- I liked that you used a direct quote from the film in your film review. You should add a little more context behind it and explain what it means and why you choose to add that quote in

Logical Structure/Organization --I Think you should definitely add more of your argument on why we should watch this. I think you did a great job with your quick summary.

Parenthetical Citations/Hyperlinks – You added all the links and stuff at the end but I think you should add them throughout the film review. I also think you should add the time tsamp on the quote and explain a little more behind it and what it has to do with the film.

What stood out to you most from the writer's film review, or what are the author's greatest strength(s)?

I really liked your hook. It was really good and really made me more intrigued to read about the film. I also think your summary was very well done. It was short and right to the point which is really good.
